Appendix K: Nomina Sacra

••297•• The Latin term Nomina Sacra (Sacred Name) identifies a highly technical debate somewhat related to our study of the Tetragrammaton in the Christian Scriptures. This debate is so specialized that according to the footnotes in Bruce Metzger's Manuscripts of the Greek Bible, less than ten scholarly books have been devoted to the subject since the early part of this century. These few books are more frequently written in Latin and German than English.¹

We have included this brief appendix to alleviate potential confusion. In the unlikely event that this subject were to be encountered by the reader, the first impression may be that Nomina Sacra support the New World Bible Translation Committee's assertion that the Tetragrammaton was used in the original Greek Christian manuscripts. However, as we will see in our conclusion, had the Committee introduced the Nomina Sacra into the Kingdom Interlinear Translation's textual apparatus, the separate identities between Jehovah and Lord Jesus would have been greatly diminished.

The Nomina Sacra identified

The Nomina Sacra are contracted Greek words representing 15 frequently occurring names (or titles) in Scripture. The contraction was written with an overline. We have previously identified these contractions as surrogates, with the earlier explanation that they were primarily used as short-hand notations. These contractions occur in both the Septuagint papyri manuscripts and the Greek Christian Scripture papyri manuscripts.

On page 36 of the book cited, Metzger lists all 15 of the Nomina Sacra found in the entire Greek papyri collection, which includes the Septuagint. He reproduces them in their nominative (subject of the sentence) and genitive (possessive) forms² as follows:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>English meaning</th>
<th>Greek word</th>
<th>Nominative (subject)</th>
<th>Genitive (possessive)</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>God</td>
<td>θεός</td>
<td>θς</td>
<td>θυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lord</td>
<td>κύριος</td>
<td>κς</td>
<td>κυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jesus</td>
<td>Ἰησοῦς</td>
<td>ις</td>
<td>υυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christ</td>
<td>χριστός</td>
<td>χς</td>
<td>χυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Son³</td>
<td>υἱός</td>
<td>υς</td>
<td>υυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Spirit</td>
<td>πνεῦμα</td>
<td>πνα</td>
<td>πνυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>David</td>
<td>Δαυεὶδ</td>
<td>Δαδο</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>cross</td>
<td>σταυρός</td>
<td>στς</td>
<td>στυ</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mary</td>
<td>μητηρο</td>
<td>μηρ</td>
<td>μηρυ</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

¹ Only two sources were available for the author's personal study of the Nomina Sacra. The first consisted of selected photocopied chapters from a book published in South Africa by A.H.R.E. Paap entitled Nomina Sacra in the Greek Papyri of the First Five Centuries A.D., published in 1959. The second was a brief description of the work of others on pages 36-37 in Bruce Metzger's book Manuscripts of the Greek Bible, published in 1981.

² The highest frequency of occurrence of the Greek noun is in either the nominative or genitive form. A Nomina Sacra may appear in other of the remaining Greek noun forms as well. Thus, κύριος (KYROS) could appear as any one of κς, κυ, κω, κυ, or κε in ancient Greek manuscripts.

³ Common words such as Son or Man become Nomina Sacra when used in conjunction with the name of Jesus. The word Heaven is identified as a Nomina Sacra when used to replace the word God. For example, Matthew uses the expression Kingdom of the heavens in many parallel passages where the other Gospel writers use the expression Kingdom of God.

⁴ The ordinary meaning of this Greek word is mother. It is only in its sense as a Nomina Sacra in which it is used of Mary, Jesus' mother. Needless to say, these Nomina Sacra notations were imported—we believe—into certain Greek manuscripts at a later date and do not necessarily reflect the writing (or theology) of the inspired writers themselves.
To those defending this specialized Greek contractual form, the technical designation Nomina Sacra connotes a sacral (as against a profane) meaning. However, though the Nomina Sacra may be used to identify deity, the term itself does not mean divine name. The use of the designation Nomina Sacra does not imply the elevation of the addressee to the status of deity, though in certain instances, the Nomina Sacra may directly identify God.

A study of the Nomina Sacra is germane to the entire collection of first- through fifth-century Greek language Scripture texts. This includes the Septuagint as well as the Christian Scriptures. For this appendix, however, we are concerned only with the Nomina Sacra found in the Christian Greek Scriptures. (The Hebrew Scriptures present no unsolved dilemma; we can readily verify over 6,000 instances in which any Septuagint text using Nomina Sacra was translated from in the original Hebrew text.)

The Nomina Sacra debate

The Nomina Sacra debate concerns the use and meaning of the contractions we have previously identified as surrogates. Many scholars consider the overlined contractions which are readily observable in ancient papyri to be mere abbreviations of frequently used words. This is the recognized meaning of the term surrogate. The use of contractions can be expected considering the labor involved in hand-copying scripture texts.

On the other hand, some scholars have identified these words as constituting a class of unique, sacred names which the copyist has identified by an overlined and abbreviated form. The scholars defending this position say that the intent of the copyist was far from merely a savings in papyrus sheet material and the manual effort of writing by shortening the word. In defense of their thesis, many examples have been identified in ancient manuscripts in which the word Kyrios is written in full as ἐντῶν when referring to a human master, and yet is written as when referring to Jesus (or Jehovah) as Lord. Similar examples of other surrogate words also exist.

The debate also concerns the source of Nomina Sacra. It was originally argued by the Latin palaeographer Ludwig Traube that the practice was of early, Septuagint era, Jewish origin. The latter work by Paap argues that the form was introduced at a later date by Jewish Christians.

The Nomina Sacra and inspired Scripture

The reader must understand that this debate does not concern the content of inspired Scripture. Many—including the author of this book—hold that the inspired Christian writers did not use contractions in their original writings; they did not use surrogates. The alteration was one which was introduced by scribes in later centuries. The best efforts of textual critics to reproduce the original work of the inspired Christian writers results in a text without surrogates as reproduced in the Westcott and Hort or United Bible Societies Greek texts.

Therefore, the debate concerning Nomina Sacra versus surrogates is not dealing with the content of inspired Scripture. Rather, it is merely evaluating the practice of scribes in succeeding centuries. If, in fact, the debate could be settled by identifying the surrogates as a simple short-hand device, then the overlined words would have no implied, deeper meaning. If, on the other hand, the debate were to be settled in favor of intentional Nomina Sacra, then some explanation would need to be given for the meaning added to the text by the scribes. Yet, that meaning (in symbol form) is not one which was placed in the text by the original, inspired Christian writers.
Appendix K: Nomina Sacra

The meaning of the Nomina Sacra in our study

A study of the Nomina Sacra is a worthwhile, though very technical, undertaking. There is merit in determining whether the early church regarded these Greek names as sacred names, or whether these overlined words merely represented a scribal short-hand to reduce the labor of hand-copying texts. However, the answer to the above examination of ancient Greek manuscripts is extraneous to the primary question of our study. Our study is limited to the inspired writers' use of the Tetragrammaton in their original written documents.

However, it is possible that the Nomina Sacra could give an important answer to our search for the Tetragrammaton in the original writings of the inspired Christian authors. One of two conditions would draw our immediate attention to the Nomina Sacra as probable descendants of the Tetragrammaton:

1. If we found Nomina Sacra forms of Κυρίος (κ—σ, κυ, κνυ, κυν, or κε) (or similar forms for the word Θεός) within ancient Christian Scripture Greek manuscripts which were restricted to the 237 occurrences of the Jehovah references within the New World Translation, we would be immediately alerted to the probability that a manuscript change had occurred in the early centuries of the church. This presence of the Nomina Sacra would give strong evidence that יהוה was used in the original writings.

2. If, at the very least, we found a consistent use of Nomina Sacra forms of Κυρίος (or Θεός) restricted to each of the 425 quotations of Hebrew Scripture passages in these same ancient Christian Scripture Greek manuscripts, we could be alerted to the possibility that the Tetragrammaton was used by the inspired writers when they quoted Hebrew Scriptures which contained the divine name.

We must be careful not to overstate the material which was available to us from Paap's extensive summaries. Nonetheless, these papyri studies clearly show use of surrogates (contractions) in a considerably greater frequency than would be the cases were they restricted to Hebrew Scripture citations of the divine name. The forms (κσ, κυ, κνυ, κυν, or κε) are apparently used throughout the papyri texts in those cases where Κυρίος is used of either the Lord Jesus or references to Jehovah of the Hebrew Scriptures. Consequently, some contracted form will be found in the majority of the 714 Κυρίος (or Θεός) references in the Christian Greek Scriptures. In general, the word is written in full as κυρίος only in those instances which refer to others besides Jesus or Jehovah in the Christian Scripture accounts.

Conclusion

It is outside the purpose of this Appendix to determine the meaning of the Nomina Sacra (Sacred Names) as used in ancient Greek Scripture manuscripts. However, the recurrent appearance of the Nomina Sacra throughout extant biblical manuscripts far surpass the frequency and location of the 237 Jehovah references in the Christian Scriptures of the New World Translation.

We can only assume that the New World Bible Translation Committee was aware of the Nomina Sacra, yet chose not to bring this material into their textual apparatus to establish the presence of the Tetragrammaton in a limited 237 instances within the Christian Scriptures. The great number of occurrences of Nomina Sacra (surrogates) within the text of the Christian Scripture Greek manuscripts would preclude such an attempt. Any appeal to the Nomina Sacra with the intent of establishing the presence of the divine name in the Christian Greek Scriptures would, of consequence, 5 The number 42 represents the verified uses of the Tetragrammaton in Hebrew Scripture quotations as identified by J20 which is shown in Appendix G. This number could be expanded to the possible 112 Hebrew Scripture citations as noted in the summary at the end of Appendix B.

6 This information is taken from Paap, Nomina Sacra in the Greek Papyri of the First Five Centuries A.D., pages 8-118 in which he catalogs and summarizes the Nomina Sacra from a large number of ancient manuscripts. Paap gives one of many examples from a Chester Beatty manuscript identified as "Facsimile III, New Testament," in which he says (p. 101):

...in [this manuscript] (±A.D.200); in the sacral meaning there are 170 contractions, whereas in the 4 cases where κυρίος (plural) has the profane meaning the word has been written in full.
identify the person of Christ with Jehovah. If it were to be argued that the Nomina Sacra in the form of ἱλς (for κυρίος) is a derivative of הוהי, then it could be forcefully argued—with a large number of examples of ἱλς referring to Jesus—that the inspired Christian writers used הוהי of Jesus himself.